

The Handbook for Catholic Moms

Nurturing Your Heart, Mind, Body, and Soul

Lisa M. Hendey

Creator of CatholicMom.com

Lisa Hendey is the sister friend of Catholic motherhood! We know her so well through her work for families, her website, and her engaging podcasts. Lisa now brings us her book in which she openly discusses the essential elements of a Catholic mom's life in an exceptionally delightful, engaging, dynamic, and practical manner. You'll be turning pages and feeling as if Lisa is there by your side lovingly offering her insight and warm encouragement. You're going to love this book!

Donna-Marie Cooper O'Boyle

Host of EWTN's Everyday Blessings For Catholic Moms

Every mom needs a few good tools in her belt, to help her handle life's challenges and The Handbook for Catholic Moms belongs on your short list of indispensable resources. Does your marriage need a tune-up? Does your friendship garden need cultivating? Could your parenting skills use a little remedial attention? This book offers sound advice to help you meet these and other challenges with confidence and grace.

Heidi Hess Saxton

Author of My Big Book of Catholic Bible Stories

Lisa Hendey's passion for Catholic motherhood is born of many influences and I am proud to know that her experience as a Notre Dame student ranks among the most significant. This book is overflowing with Lisa's generous spirit, deep compassion, and infectious enthusiasm for her family, her Church, and the vocation of Catholic motherhood. She makes a wonderful and most welcome contribution to our faith community.

Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, C.S.C.

President Emeritus

University of Notre Dame

Warm, wise, funny, compassionate, faith-filled, and, above all experienced in the joys and struggles of family life, Lisa Hendey's new book will be a lifesaver to Catholic women who try, hope, and pray to be good moms.

Rev. James Martin, S.J.

Author of My Life with the Saints

CatholicMom.com has long been a treasured Internet gathering spot. The Handbook for Catholic Moms is a welcome extension of Lisa's wisdom and energy, enriched by the experiences of the community of women who have found community, support, and strength through CatholicMom.com.

Amy Welborn

Author of A Catholic Woman's Book of Days

Kudos to fellow blogger Lisa Hendey for such a comprehensive, holistic companion for women who can use their faith as a tool to empower themselves as mothers, as wives, and as individuals on the pilgrimage of life.

Therese Borchard

Author of Beyond Blue

There is a saying: "A candle loses nothing by lighting another candle." For years, Lisa has been the candle that lights so many others. This book is wonderful for Catholic moms (and others) to experience the Light burning inside as well as around Lisa Hendey. She is a gift to people of faith and journey.

Deacon Tom Fox

Columnist and Podcaster at Deacontomonline.com

The Handbook for Catholic Moms

Nurturing Your Heart, Mind, Body, and Soul

Lisa M. Hendey

Creator of CatholicMom.com

ave maria press  notre dame, indiana

To Greg, Eric, and Adam with thanks for a lifetime of love and happiness

Scripture texts used in this work are taken from The New American Bible copyright © 1991, 1986, and 1970 by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, Washington, DC, and are used by permission of the copyright owner. All rights reserved. No part of The New American Bible may be reproduced in any form or by any means without permission in writing from the publisher.

© 2010 by Lisa M. Hendey

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever, except in the case of reprints in the context of reviews, without written permission from Ave Maria Press®, Inc., P.O. Box 428, Notre Dame, IN 46556.

Founded in 1865, Ave Maria Press is a ministry of the Indiana Province of Holy Cross.

www.avemariapress.com

ISBN-10 1-59471-228-X ISBN-13 978-1-59471-228-9

Cover image © Jupiter Images.

Cover and text design by Katherine Robinson Coleman.

Printed and bound in the United States of America.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Hendey, Lisa M.

The handbook for Catholic moms : nurturing your heart, mind, body, and soul /
Lisa M. Hendey.

p. cm.

ISBN-13: 978-1-59471-228-9 (pbk.)

ISBN-10: 1-59471-228-X (pbk.)

1. Mothers—Religious life. 2. Motherhood—Religious aspects—Catholic Church.

I. Title.

BX2353.H44 2010

248.8'431—dc22

2009049529

Contents

Preface * vii

Part I: Heart * 1

Chapter 1: A Match Made in Heaven * 2

Chapter 2: Somebody's Mom * 14

Chapter 3: Soul Sisters * 30

Chapter 4: Faith Family * 38

Chapter 5: Special Circumstances * 48

Chapter 6: You're Never Alone * 60

Part II: Mind * 73

Chapter 7: School's Never Out * 74

Chapter 8: Working Things Out * 84

Chapter 9: Beating the Clock * 94

Chapter 10: The Family Banker * 104

Chapter 11: Weaving Your Way through the Web * 114

Chapter 12: Cultivating Creativity * 124

Part III: Body * 135

Chapter 13: Fitness Focus * 136

Chapter 14: Fuel for the Journey * 148

Chapter 15: "And Protect Us from All Anxiety" * 158

Chapter 16: Doctor's Orders * 168

Part IV: Soul * 177

Chapter 17: Prioritizing Prayer * 178

Chapter 18: Mass Matters * 188

Chapter 19: A Mother's Mother * 198

Chapter 20: Sainly Solutions * 210

Chapter 21: The Beauty of the Bible * 222

Chapter 22: Culture of Faith * 232

Acknowledgments * 243

Preface

Writing a book is a daunting task. At many times during this project I was tempted to lay aside my laptop and simply go shopping instead. After all, who am I to be giving you advice on anything, and particularly on a topic as important as motherhood?

Like most of you reading this book, my training has been on the job—a series of dramatic trial and error opportunities, with ten steps back for every one step forward. So let me say up front that I don't come to this work considering myself an expert. In truth, with this project—as with so many others I've undertaken in my life—I have hoped to learn as I go. Learning with you, first crawling, and then with the most unstable of baby steps, I want to continue along my own path of trying my very best to become a better Catholic mom, a healthier woman, and ultimately a better person.

First, let me explain to you that I am not setting out to write a typical parenting book. You will not find here the mysterious key to unlocking the mind of a two-year-old or the heart of a petulant teenager. I don't have solutions for getting a baby to sleep through the night or for dealing with a sarcastic adolescent. Rather, I am writing this book to try to support and encourage you in your role as a Catholic mom and to encourage all of us to nurture ourselves as mothers, so that we have the energy, spirit, and peaceful souls to help take care of those who fill our homes and our lives.

When I'm asked in a social setting that ubiquitous question, "What do you do?" I invariably respond with the same reply: "I'm a mom." This, my vocation, began in a dramatic and quite definite way nearly nineteen years ago in partnership with my husband Greg with the arrival of our son Eric. But in a more subtle way, it began long before that blessed event.

I'd fallen in love with Greg at first sight as he strolled across the quad at our alma mater, the University of Notre Dame. Mutual friends introduced us, and I still remember the moment a few months later when Greg finally asked me on a date. We entered into the sacrament of matrimony together, in the breathtaking Basilica of the Sacred Heart at Notre Dame, the year after our graduation.

After five years of marriage, three during Greg's medical school and two in his emergency medicine residency, we took the giant leap of faith into parenthood. I was so career oriented at that time that Eric could likely have been born on my desk at work. My definite plans to return as soon as possible to my career were laid aside the moment I began to explore day care options. For us, the choice was clear—I “retired” and set myself to the full-time task of learning to become a mom. With Adam’s birth three years later, my apprenticeship continued and took on new challenges.

Greg, although incredibly supportive of my faith life and of raising our sons in the faith, had not yet joined the Church himself. I felt a huge responsibility to be the primary faith educator of my sons and realized how short I fell in my own preparation for this role. I was looking for support and companionship from other moms struggling with the same things I was.

Just over ten years ago now, I was learning web design in a volunteer position at my boys’ Catholic school when I came up with the crazy idea to start a little website that would celebrate Catholic motherhood. In creating the site, I hoped to explore and learn about faith and family topics and to build a community of like-minded mothers with whom I could share support and encouragement. And so, CatholicMom.com, was born. In those early days, the site was a tiny endeavor and the “hit counter” marked visits to our little domain in the dozens each day. But from the very beginning, it was apparent to me that there was a tremendous need for this type of place—a safe, loving environment where we women could gather together to learn, to discuss, and, most importantly, to pray for one another in our vocation as mothers.

From those very seminal moments of the site through today, one mainstay in my life has been the daily e-mails I receive from moms around the world who are struggling in their vocation as “Mom.” These e-mails often carry a tone of quiet desperation and pain that tears at my heart. They come from women who feel burned out, overwhelmed, and often very alone in their own little corners of the world. This is an easy thing to have happen when you’re a mom. Overnight, with the incredible miracle of birth, your life is transformed. We go from creatures of independence to women who can’t even find five minutes to use the bathroom alone. Along with the countless blessings of becoming “Mom” are the occasions of sacrificial service we provide on an hourly basis. Many of us are ill-equipped to cope with these transitions, and we run the risk of becoming bitter and resentful in the care of our families.

Blessedly, we belong to a larger family, our Catholic Church. It's my firm belief that within our Catholic traditions we have many of the tools necessary to refresh and renew our souls and spirits. In my writing and in my personal life, I am vitally interested in looking daily at my own private journey toward being a better person. The journey is multifaceted, so it's necessary to work, a bit at a time, on each of those facets. Focusing on any one of them uniquely and ignoring the others throws off the balance necessary to keep life's wheels rolling along smoothly. My own personal experience with non-invasive breast cancer during the writing of this book has left me even more convinced of every mom's need to care for herself in every way possible.

In this book, we'll take a look at four areas of focus, endeavoring to take those first "baby steps" in each, toward the ultimate goal of caring for ourselves better as moms, as women, and as Catholics.

Heart: developing nurturing relationships with our family, our friends, and ourselves

Mind: becoming life-long learners, seeking creative outlets, exploring career and work issues, and employing time management and personal productivity tactics

Body: examining nutrition, fitness, sleep, stress reduction, and preventative care matters

Soul: coming to know and love the many resources, devotions, and concepts in the fullness of the Catholic Church that can help us care for ourselves and for the most important people in our lives

The Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life issues an annual report in its attempt to promote a "deeper understanding of issues at the intersection of religion and public affairs." In its 2008 report titled "U.S. Religious Landscape Survey," Pew looked at the percentage of Americans switching religious affiliations and found that in the United States the Roman Catholic Church "has experienced the greatest net losses as a result of affiliation change." About a third of Catholic survey respondents indicated that they no longer identify themselves with the Catholic Church. "This means that roughly 10 percent of all Americans are former Catholics."

In my heart, this sad news was a rallying cry for us Catholic moms and dads, who are truly on the frontlines in the battle for our families' souls. If we, as parents and as individuals, do not truly embrace the many graces and blessings offered to us in the Church, how can we possibly expect to pass them along to our children? I hope that someday I'll experience the same joy my parents do when they attend the baptism or first communion of one of their grandchildren—the joy in knowing that they have done their most important job of sharing a love of Christ and his Church with their children. If we moms don't embrace and truly love our faith traditions, then we may be adding to the next generations of former Catholics. On the other hand, if our children look to us and find happy, productive, and selfless models of Christ's love incarnate, as I did in my own mom, their desire to be a loving part of the Body of Christ will be all the greater.

In his April 2008 apostolic journey to the United States, Pope Benedict XVI stressed the theme "Christ Our Hope." Everywhere he turned, the Holy Father was embraced and greeted with infectious enthusiasm. Speaking to a huge youth rally at St. Joseph Seminary in Yonkers, New York, Benedict XVI said,

Let us pray for mothers and fathers throughout the world, particularly those who may be struggling in any way—socially, materially, spiritually. Let us honor the vocation of matrimony and the dignity of family life. Let us always appreciate that it is in families that vocations are given life.

Acknowledging those struggles that each of us face every day and buoyed by our prayers for one another, I invite you, my fellow Catholic moms, to join me on a journey of love—loving and caring for ourselves more so that we can better love and care for our families, our neighbors, our Church, and the world it is sent to serve.

PART I: Heart

NURTURING OURSELVES
THROUGH THE CREATION AND SUSTENANCE
OF EMOTIONALLY HEALTHY RELATIONSHIPS

C H A P T E R O N E

A Match Made in heaven

An Overview of Catholic Marriage Commitments

“This one, at last, is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; This one shall be called ‘woman,’ for out of ‘her man’ this one has been taken.” That is why a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife, and the two of them become one body.

—Genesis 2:23-24

My Story

This year, Greg and I will celebrate a monumental wedding anniversary, our twenty-third year of marriage together. You won't find the twenty-third anniversary on most lists of milestones, nor are there many personalized greeting cards wishing couples congratulations upon twenty-three years of wedded bliss. Those are reserved for the big numbers like ten, twenty-five, or fifty.

In fact, your "monumental" anniversary year likely differs from mine, because you and your husband have walked your own path to sacramental marriage. Let me explain to you why I plan to celebrate in a big way on number twenty-three. It has little to do with traditions, and a lot to do with the fact that I was nearly twenty-three years old the year that I joined my husband in lifelong partnership. In my mind, there is significance in the fact that this will be the year my marriage exceeds my single life—meaning of course that I've spent more time being one with Greg than living on my own. Certainly, as I age, my memories of our life together far exceed those that existed before our wedding.

When we married, the notion of "I" and "me" was set to the side in favor of "we" and "us." We are a team. Although my humanity sometimes keeps me from thinking as much, my marital vows oblige me to think of Greg as an extension of myself, and thus selfish decisions need to be set aside.

And so you'll find me celebrating number twenty-three this year, rejoicing in the fact that I've been Mrs. Hendey for longer than I was ever Miss Bartholomy, and that my husband's love, companionship, and continual support have given me a life more beautiful than any I ever imagined.

Lessons I've Learned

1. Serve one another.

We have our husbands to thank for helping us to earn the most important job title most of us will ever hold—mom. So it feels fitting to begin a book about nurturing ourselves as Catholic moms by looking at the human relationship that is most central to our happiness and success at being mothers.

For most of us, the march toward motherhood began with an exchange of vows and the grace of a sacrament. Whether you married a fellow Catholic, or someone who is of another faith (like my husband at the time of our wedding), as a Catholic, you promised to lovingly accept children from God and to raise them in the Catholic Church.

Love is never something ready-made, something merely “given” to a man and woman, it is always at the same time a “task,” which they are set. Love should be seen as something which in a sense never “is” but is always only “becoming,” and what it becomes depends upon the contribution of both persons and the depth of their commitment.

—Pope John Paul II

Before I jump into my thoughts on how we, as Catholic moms, can nurture ourselves though our vocation to marriage, I want to share a few words with those moms who may be reading this book and are not married. I want you to know that I respect the tremendous work you do every day to serve your family. I want to applaud your courage for standing up to your responsibilities in countless ways. I want to give you affirmation for your decision to choose life for your children and to take the challenging steps of raising them in our faith, on your own. I try to share some further thoughts for you (from my admittedly limited view) in chapter 6, You’re Never Alone.

When we marry, notions of self are set by the wayside as we begin our families. Whether parenthood is years away or just around the corner, life as a wife prepares us for the total giving of self that will occur once our babies are born.

In my early married life, I remember chafing a bit at having to bend my agenda, goals, and desires to meet the needs of a husband who, as a medical student, led a crazy lifestyle. I regret to say that it took me years to recognize that I should alter my schedule to better lovingly serve my spouse. In an age where we are taught to be strong, independent women, that phrase, “serving my spouse,” may sound old-fashioned. But through the years, I’ve found great joy in accepting the fact that the little things I do out of love for my husband can be signs of my love not only for him, but for my God who gave me a vocation to marriage and to motherhood. I have also grown to more readily recognize the countless ways that Greg bends his desires and will to serve me. Truly marriage is about serving one another day in and day out.

2. Keep Christ at the center.

Watching my parents through a partnership that has lasted nearly fifty years has taught me many things about marriage. The first, and always the foremost, is to keep Christ at the center of my marriage.

For many years, I struggled with this concept. Greg was not Catholic when we married, and although he was incredibly supportive of my faith life and the raising of our children in the Church, I fell short in the lofty goal of making our marriage a triune partnership between Greg, God, and me. I was confounded by the fact that we weren't one of those seemingly perfect couples I saw seated around me every Sunday at Mass. Although Greg regularly came with us to church, my disappointment that he didn't share my Catholic faith traditions hurt my heart deeply.

"Look at Mrs. ____ (fill in your own blank)," I'd think to myself each Sunday in Mass. "There's her husband, Mr. ____, all dressed up in his suit and tie. He's even a Knight of Columbus! She's really lucky. Why can't Greg be the kind of husband who gathers our family for the rosary each night like Mr. _____ does?!"

It wasn't until I came to peace with Greg's own spiritual journey and began to pray deeply for my husband that I would say I really put Christ at the center of our relationship. Prior to that, I let disappointment, envy, and shortsightedness stand in Christ's spot in our relationship.

Maybe you're fortunate, and you are "equally yoked" in your faith life with your spouse. But for many of the Catholic moms I've spoken with, this is not the case. We may be much more traditional, regular, or communicative in our practice of our Catholicism than our spouses, or in some cases much less. And we, as wives and as mothers, lay a lot of blame and judgment on our spouses and ultimately on ourselves for the fact that our husbands don't compare spiritually with men we know. "If only I were a better person, a better Catholic," I would think to myself for many years, "then Greg would want to be a part of the Church."

How very selfish of me to insert myself and my needs into the spiritual life of my husband, rather than seeing the situation for what it was—Greg's unique journey toward a God who loves him unconditionally. By the time Greg joined the Catholic Church through the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA), we had been married seventeen years. I wish I had spent the first fifteen years of that initiation

For many people and in much of our cultural environment, love is about how two people make each other feel. In the seven years I've been married, I've found that concentrating solely on feelings is like eating frosting without the cake: you can enjoy it for a while, but eventually you're going to realize there's something missing underneath.

Romantic gestures are all about feelings, but it turns out that true love has to do with so much more than feelings. Ultimately, true love is sacrifice and self-gift and being willing to die for the ones you love, as Christ did. In our daily lives, where we can only hope for faint echoes of that love, true love is every single thing we do that brings us closer to perfection and to Christ—the one who loves best.

A happy side effect of that kind of loving is that it brings us closer to the ones for whom we are giving of ourselves, in a way that all the romantic gestures in the world could never do. In my years of marriage, the moments when I've loved my husband best have had nothing to do with gifts or poems or romantic dinners. I've nurtured our marriage most when I've found the grace to make sacrifices for him. Even the tiny ones he never knew about brought us closer together.

As for him, he never loves me better than he does when he takes the baby so that I can sleep in. Forget flowers; I'll take an extra hour of sleep any day! That's real romance.

Arwen Mosher is a happily married mother of two. She blogs at www.ennorath.typepad.com.

process praying more fervently for my husband, just as he was, than judging myself and not truly appreciating the depth of his quiet, unassuming spirituality.

So yes, "keeping Christ at the center of our marriage" should include the raising of our children in the faith, the attendance of Mass, the familial celebration of sacraments together, and the nurturing of one another's spirituality. But equally as important, I believe this means treating our spouses as we would treat Christ should we have the occasion to find him physically sitting in our own homes. In Catholic marriage, through our loving service to our husbands, we have the unique opportunity to truly shower the love we hold in our hearts upon others just as Jesus called us to do. We have the gift every day of praying for our husbands, our partners in parenthood—not praying to fill in the gaps or shortcomings we think we see in them, but praying for them in their vocations and lifting them spiritually via our prayers.

Every day, as I live my life with Greg, I try to look to his example of Christian living through the many things he does to support Eric, Adam, and me. I pray for his soul, for our walk together toward the potential of an eternal life in God’s presence, and in thanksgiving for my life partner—just as he is—and Christ’s very obvious presence in our marriage. I’ve learned that sometimes that presence, that “keeping Christ at the center,” looks different in my marriage than it does in anyone else’s, and that acceptance is a true and deeply rooted grace to me.

3. Nurture your marriage above extended family.

In Genesis 2:24 we hear “That is why a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife, and the two of them become one body.” Many of us heard these words proclaimed during the Liturgy of the Word at our weddings. I’ve always felt that they are a prophetic reminder to us that our wedding vows and our marital relationship should come first in our hearts.

Struggles with extended family are so prevalent that they have become a cliché in our society. Even after over twenty years of marriage, I still do little things to seek the approval of my mother-in-law, hoping that she will see me as a worthy mate for her son. My approval-seeking ways are fine if kept in moderation, but should really never become a roadblock between the woman who loves my husband as much as I do and me.

Keeping family relationships in their proper perspective is one of the most important ways we as Catholic moms can nurture our marriages, and ultimately ourselves. Many things that happen within a marriage are best kept within the confines of our homes, rather than being aired in public, even within our families of origin. As close as I am to my mother and my sisters, my relationship with Greg should always come first and foremost.

This is also an important thing to remember when extended family “situations” arise that may place a strain on our marriages, and ultimately upon us as women. When in doubt, cling to your husband and become one with him. If this means having to take a pass on a nephew’s Little League game or Thanksgiving dinner rounds to three houses (none of which are your own), do so for the sake of your spirit and for your relationship with your soul mate and life partner.

One of the best presents our parents ever gave Greg and me as we launched our lives together was their permission to begin our own independent family life. We love spending time with both sides of our family, but have never succumbed to doing so out of guilt. Early on, speak with one another and with your families about your desire to create your own family traditions and work together to make these your greatest priority. If family commitments call you to attend functions outside your home, communicate with one another and lift up one another rather than heading into attack mode or bearing resentment. Be lovingly honest with your extended families about your goal to live your marriage as your top priority. Extended family members, who love you, should respect your efforts as long as you include them graciously in your married and family life with love and open communication.

4. Play together.

One of the things that struck me with force when we had Eric was that my “fun” time with my husband greatly decreased, and I know this happens almost universally for other moms. We get so wrapped up in the care, feeding, and education of our kids that we are likely to neglect spending time with our husbands. Our communication runs the risk of falling into staff-meeting mode with quick exchanges about who’s going to handle everything that needs to happen in our busy lives. But having fun with our spouses is one of the greatest gifts we can give our children, as it models for them the true joy of a vocation to the married life.

I’m not saying that you need to plan elaborate date nights every week with your spouse—those are great, but life’s realities mean that a “date” may be more likely to happen only once a year. Rather, what I’m saying is that we should aim to turn the times that we do have together into moments of fun and happiness. Some of my fondest memories of my parents from my childhood involve them just “goofing around” together while my mom worked in the kitchen. Kisses were stolen, tickles were traded, and a dance even broke out some evenings, all played out before five sets of watchful eyes. My parents taught me that marriage was fun, not by taking extravagant trips or heading to huge social occasions, but simply by their genuine love of one another’s company.

Look for occasions to laugh and to smile with your husband. Learn to love a few of his passions and share yours with him as well. Suck it up and watch a football game on a Sunday afternoon, just to be together. Attack household duties with an eye toward making them fun—even if that means dancing in the kitchen while you load the dishes.

Date nights can be a great way to nurture yourself and your marriage, but don't think you have to spend a lot of money to have a wonderful evening. Set the table at home, prepare a special feast for the two of you complete with candlelight. Hold hands and talk, or just rest comfortably in each other's company. Remember why you fell in love with your husband and the things about you that drew him to you.

5. Be generous with unspoken signs of love.

I've learned in my marriage to look for nonverbal signs of love from my husband. The truth is that sometimes, if I'm being truly attentive, these unspoken signs of love can touch me even more deeply than the regular "I love you" phrase we share with one another. When I rush out to my car to find a freshly filled gas tank, I never cease to smile because my husband knows that filling up my car is one of the biggest ways he can show his love for me.

Another nonverbal sign of love is the vacuum cleaner I hear running upstairs most Saturday mornings. Since I hate to vacuum, Greg's attention to this particular weekly chore is a constant reminder of how blessed I am to be married to this man. The truth is, we never sat down and had a division of labor conversation where we decided he would vacuum and I would sweep—he just started doing it one week because he knew how much I dislike it.

Because Greg is so generous with his love for me in so many little ways, I try to look for ways of my own to show my commitment to

The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of the whole of life, is by its nature ordered toward the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring; this covenant between baptized persons has been raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a sacrament.

—Code of Canon Law, 1055 him. I am by nature a messy person. It's not really that I'm a slob—I just get so busy with so many different things at once that I tend to leave things scattered a bit. But because I married a neat freak, I make special efforts to keep things organized in the areas where my husband would be driven crazy by my stacks of “stuff.” I guess you can't really call a clean kitchen counter a renewal of wedding vows, but in our case it is definitely an unspoken sign of how much I love my husband that I often try to rush to clear things up a bit when I know that he is on his way home. Call me old-fashioned, but I want his return at the end of the day to be as warm and welcoming as I can make it—I'm not donning pearls and fresh mascara or laying out his slippers, but the least I can do is try to help him arrive home to a welcoming environment.

Your nonverbal signs of love for your spouse will be completely different than mine, as they should be. Perhaps what I am trying to say here is that I believe in the importance of both spoken and unspoken love affirmations. I believe in hugs goodbye and “I love you!” at the end of every phone call. But I also believe in a fresh cup of coffee sweetly delivered with a smile or a trash can taken to the curb so that he gets a week off from doing that particular chore.

Study your spouse and look for your own special ways of showing your love for him, both in spoken words and in small acts of love. In lovingly serving one another in large and little ways, we nurture our marriages and our souls.

6. Get help when you're “broken.”

Marriages come in all shapes and sizes. Many of them encounter rough patches that feel like spiritual and emotional droughts. In the same way that we may sometimes feel a void in our relationship with God, we can encounter moments of physical and emotional separation from our spouses. When these moments occur, it is important for our families and ourselves as women and moms that we reach out for needed support and counseling. If you face difficulty in your marriage, there are many resources that can support and encourage you in finding help.

The Church: Call your parish and make an appointment to speak with your pastor or other trusted member of the pastoral staff. Do not try to have this conversation randomly after Mass on Sunday, but rather schedule a time to receive his or her pastoral counsel. He or she will likely have local resources to recommend that will help you to receive the services you need. Your pastor or another member of his staff should be able to minister to you spiritually and can help you remain close to the sacraments.

Retrouvaille: Retrouvaille is a French word meaning “rediscovery,” and the Retrouvaille program is designed to assist couples with marital problems, including those who are considering marriage separation or those who are already separated or divorced and want help. Catholic in origin, Retrouvaille operates around the country in local communities. To learn more about the Retrouvaille program in your area, call 800-470-2230 or visit www.retrouvaille.org.

Catholic Charities: Across the United States, local Catholic Charities agencies are at work providing counseling and support services to strengthen and encourage families. Their counselors are available to assist with a variety of issues that may be affecting your marriage, including, but not limited to, addiction services, mental health services, and pregnancy and adoption services. To find your local Catholic Charities agency, visit www.catholiccharitiesusa.org.

Mom's Homework

- ✓ Recall your celebration of the Rite of Marriage in a special way by watching the video of your wedding or viewing pictures of that special day with your husband and children. Recall the readings and songs you selected for your liturgy and consider compiling a CD of these to share with your husband and to enjoy yourself.
- ✓ Make a pilgrimage to the church where you were married or “adopt” a special church and attend Mass there together annually to celebrate your anniversary.
- ✓ Look for three ways you might enjoy some play time with your husband. Take a walk together, watch his favorite sport together, tackle a small home project as a team, or simply sit quietly in one another's company once a week.
- ✓ Look for a few nonverbal ways you can show your love for your spouse. Do these lovingly and without expecting his comment or appreciation. Offer them as a prayer for your marriage.

- ✓ Speak with your parents or find an older couple whose marriage you admire and invite them to dinner. Ask for their wisdom on what has worked and sustained them in marriage.
- ✓ Smile at your husband, hug him, enjoy his company, and let your children see your happiness with one another. Holy Cross Father Theodore M. Hesburgh, president emeritus of the University of Notre Dame, is credited with having once said, "The most important thing a father can do for his children is to love their mother." I think Fr. Hesburgh's words of wisdom apply to us moms as well!

Web Resources

For Your Marriage (USCCB): www.foryourmarriage.org

An initiative of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops that includes marriage preparation information and a wealth of resources and encouragement for married couples

Worldwide Marriage Encounter: www.wwme.org

Turn a good marriage into a great marriage by learning realistic and well-established techniques of loving communication

Retrouvaille: www.retrouvaille.org

Help for struggling marriages

Pastoral Solutions Institute: www.exceptionalmarriages.com

Licensed Catholic pastoral counselors who provide telephone counseling services with solid Catholic theological principles

